

Thank you! Here is the draft:

"Making a full game is an entirely different experience than a small game jam- it's now much more challenging, and that's when we have to deploy Step 4, the most important step, of the 7 Step Blueprint formula for success - Planning.

And one of the best tools to do this is Milanote, the sponsor of today's video. Trust me when I say I already had a yearly PRO subscription to this service before this.

Milanote is a visual tool for organizing any sort of creative project. It consists of boards where you can place anything from text, to images, to tables, and my favorite part are sub-boards, so you can easily keep things neat.

Heck, I even wrote the script to this video in Milanote!

My favorite part is it's seamless online collaboration, so I can easily invite my friend to my board and we can edit it in real-time.

They also have tons of templates that you can use to plan your games. Like this Brainstorming one where you can post inspiration images and brain dump your ideas into.

Once you've come up with a basic idea for your game, you can start filling out your Game Design Document, sort of like a blueprint for how to build your game.

This can include a mood board, which is how you want people to feel while playing your game and the color schemes you want to use, a very important step in making your game stand out among thousands of others.

From there you can figure out the Story behind the game, the characters, their relationships, the level design, and how the general flow of the game will work.

They have a ton of different elements which are an easy drag and drop to use, and you can even add some handwriting to your boards.

Milanote has a great starting template for each of these steps.

And once you've determined the gameplay, you can easily keep track of development milestones and your budget all in Milanote.

There are literally an infinite amount of uses for this tool and they have great example use cases to get you started.

It's the tool I use for almost everything and I highly recommend it for any creative project. You can sign up completely free with no subscription in the link down below. "